Teacher Workforce Outreach Plan

Introduction

The most important school-level factor in the quality of education for students is the quality of their teacher. This has been confirmed by numerous researchers. Improving the quality of education for all students requires improving the quality of the adults who provide it. The recruitment and retention of high quality individuals to teach students is foundational to school reform efforts.

Persistent Teacher Shortages

Teacher shortages are not new. There have always been content areas and geographic locations where recruiting and retaining high quality individuals as teachers are a challenge. In a majority of states, content areas such as math, special education, science, and foreign language are persistent shortage areas. Missouri is one of these states. Perhaps more concerning is that these shortage areas have been persistent over time. We have yet to identify and implement strategies that address this challenge. More recently, issues around teacher shortage appear to be expanding to additional content areas and geographic locations that have not experienced them before. Increasing the number of candidates in the teacher education pipeline and increasing teacher retention are two ways to address shortage areas.

Diversity

A review of data over the past six years has found very little change in the overall diversity of the Missouri teacher workforce. Missouri's teacher workforce is predominantly white and female. Over the past six years, white teachers have made up about 93% of the overall workforce, with black teachers ranging between 4.9% and 5.2% and "other" between 1.5% and 1.8%. The gender of the teacher workforce is out of balance as well. Missouri's teacher workforce has been consistently 78% or more female. By contrast, the Missouri student population is about 72% white, 16% black, and 12% other. The CCSSO document Leading for Equity (2017) notes the importance of having diversity in the educator workforce. In particular, it maintains, "State leaders should focus on hiring more diverse teachers, principals and system leaders to reflect changing student demographics." Recent research maintains that students achieve at higher levels when they have at least one teacher who reflects their background.

The Outreach Plan

Issues such as shortages in particular content areas and geographic locations, recruiting more diverse and male candidates into the profession and increasing retention rates of teachers currently in our schools are complex issues. The Teacher Workforce Outreach Plan puts forth a process for addressing these issues. Phase 1 of the plan focuses on accumulating data from key stakeholder groups across Missouri. This will be added to the data already presented in the Teacher Workforce presentation at the January State Board of Education meeting. That presentation included both national research and state-level data. Phase 2 of the plan focuses on the formulation of strategies based on issues as evidenced by the data. This will include careful alignment of the solutions the strategies offer to the issues raised in the data as well as prioritization of strategies based on practical and realistic considerations. Phase 3 focuses on the engagement and mobilization of key stakeholders to implement those strategies with highest priority. It also includes a mechanism to monitor the fidelity of strategy implementation. These three phases represent a collaborative approach to addressing challenges to the teacher workforce due to insufficient teacher candidates, lack of teacher diversity, and persistent shortage areas.

1. Phase One: Gather data on the recruitment and retention of high quality and diverse individuals for the Missouri teacher workforce

OBJECTIVE	METRIC	HOW MEASURED?	WHEN?
Goal 1. Clarify issues related to recruitment and retention of the teacher workforce from an administrator perspective
